

38

P-892

And should it be disorganized
through the training or education it receives, it nevertheless seeks always to be free from its confusion.

The idea that one has to run to organized religion ^{or psychology} to find peace of mind is ridiculous.
The mind is its own organization and disorganization according to the way it is permitted to unfold.

But no matter how it is being trained, it is being educated, it will always seek to be free from its confusion. For this the mind struggles. ^{not only} that, but it has ^{always} within itself that principle of order by which it can heal itself itself.

provided only, through early guidance, it knows how to conduct itself.
{enough}

But if ever help is needed when the mind discovers itself in difficulties, it may consult the philosophers and the prophets and the great world leaders whom we have had throughout the ages. And to indict religion for inadequacy here, and to advise it to learn from the recent discoveries in psychology, is to miss the point that while religion